

Carlota Díaz-Guerra Prats

FILM REVIEW: FREEDOM WRITERS

The film "Freedom Writers" is about a teacher called Erin who's new at a high school in New York. This had a lot of prestige but then there was a lot of immigration and everything changed. She was married to an architect.

As usual, Erin was given the worst class at the high school. There were gangs and the students were always fighting to protect their families or friends. The teachers thought she could change that, so she started taking the students to a school trip at a museum or giving them new reading books (she had to look for 2 new jobs!) but her husband didn't accept that so they could write whatever they wanted and leave her read it or not.

In the end, all the students loved her and also each other. They had to say goodbye to Erin, but they fought for her and they could graduate and go to the University with her. They never gave up.

I loved the film because it shows you never to give up and to continue trying it. I would recommend it to everyone so they can think about their lucky lives.